

McLean Lions Hear Of CIA Innovations

STATINTL

Pneumatic chutes in the nearly-completed Central Intelligence Agency building at Langley will deliver not only messages but stationery supplies and other materials.

The tubes were one of the innovations described by Mel Wettergreen, deputy chief of the building planning staff, in a talk before the McLean Lions Club.

Mr. Wettergreen said the agency will start to occupy the $50 million building next month. The site is on the Potomac River between the George Washington Parkway and Chain Bridge Road (Route 123).

Road and bridge projects now under construction will bring the new headquarters closer to the homes of CIA employees who live in Maryland or outside the McLean area in Fairfax County. Mr. Wettergreen said the George Washington Parkway is now being extended from CIA to the Capital Beltway at Cabin John Bridge.

This section of the beltway is to be completed within a year, and the bridge is to be finished by the end of 1962.

Additional bus service from Washington and from Arlington is planned for CIA employees, Mr. Wettergreen said.
